The most famous depiction of collared dogs at the hunt in the medieval era is probably the Bayeux Tapestry which records the victory of William the Conqueror (l. c. 1027-1087 CE) at the Battle of Hastings in 1066 CE over the king of England, Harold Godwinson (also known as Harold II, r. January–October 1066 CE). The tapestry—more accurately described as an embroidery—was likely commissioned by Bishop Odo, William’s half-brother, sometime in the 1070s CE. Across its detailed visual narrative, it presents several hunting and travel scenes in which dogs accompany nobles, soldiers, and attendants. These animals wear slim, functional collars, most likely crafted from sturdy leather, each fitted with a metal ring for attaching a leash. The collars vary in color and appearance, offering subtle insight into the materials, craftsmanship, and stylistic preferences of the period.🐕
